

Please revise your July 25 interpretation of regulations regarding unsolicited faxes. It should be intuitively obvious that a company be allowed to communicate with another company where an established business relationship exists without express written permission. To require written permission would be an unnecessary burden and result in a reduction in productivity at a time when our nation's economy depends on increased productivity, not the pure waste of additional regulatory friction, waste, and frustration. We are the people, and the people say clearly this regulation is a bad idea.
